Traumatic injury is the leading cause of death for people below age 46, and death due to traumatic bleeding can occur in less than five minutes. Everyone has the power to stop life-threatening bleeding caused by injuries in the home, industrial settings, or mass-casualty events. The Stop the Bleed program provides this free familiarization course on the principles of bleeding control and providing first aid until the arrival of emergency responders. The program was commissioned by the White House following the Sandy Hook disaster in Newtown, Connecticut. A joint committee of emergency responders, law enforcement, and physicians developed a national policy on increasing survivability following mass-casualty events called the Hartford Consensus. The consensus found that victims of trauma are susceptible to critical blood loss before first responders can reach the scene, and that immediate bystander care is critical in preventing survivable death.
