The transformation of Medicaid to Regional Care Organizations provides an opportunity for health care professionals to integrate primary care and behavioral health, an approach supporting improved health outcomes for patients and reduced health care expenditures. Currently, behavioral health care is mostly separate from primary care practices. Changing from two independent systems of care to an integrated system of care requires changing practice patterns, treatment plans, payment methods, and communications. Dr. Capobianco will address the latest approaches to integrating primary care and behavioral health services from a community provider perspective and share a “road map” to successful collaboration.
